The story of a girl who to her father has always been a pink princess. But she never liked pink, and even though the older she got the more she protested, and her grandmother also tried to explain, he could never understand. So one day she had an idea. She bought him some glasses. Special ones, that can see everything. And when her father put them on, he saw what she had been trying to tell him all those years. His daughter is a princess, but a different coloured one. This story shows how society imposes predefined stereotypes on girls just because they're born girls: they have to be princesses and princesses are pink. But really when a girl or boy is born, they must be free to be whatever colour they want to be.
